The algorithm rewards outrage.

The bots manufacture consensus.

In an open feed, volume replaces truth.

So we told ourselves, "We have social media now. We have X, Instagram, open feeds".
But what has the digital town square actually become? It’s an algorithmic battleground. Platforms are engineered to amplify whatever causes the most emotional friction, because outrage generates screen time and ad clicks.

And behind the curtain, AI bot farms and coordinated IT cells manufacture trends and rig online sentiment in minutes. When an everyday citizen in Darbhanga, Belagavi, or Nagpur logs on, their genuine lived experience is drowned out by synthetic noise. If anyone can generate 10,000 bot accounts for free, the open internet can never be a trusted scoreboard. To uncover the truth, verification must be structural.

We have built rocket engine to land on the moon, we have built world-class digital payments with UPI, but we have zero sovereign infrastructure to measure our own public opinion.
